VEIN. n. ſ. [veine, Fr. vena, Latin.]

1. The veins are only a continuation of the extreme capillary arteries reflected back again towards the heart, and uniting their channels as they approach it, till at laſt they all form three large veins; the cava deſcendens, which brings the blood back from all the parts above the heart; the cava aſcendens, which brings the blood from all the parts below the heart; and the porta, which carries the blood to the liver. The coats of the veins are the ſame with thoſe of the arteries, only the muſcular coat is as thin in all the veins, as it is in the capillary arteries, the preſſure of the blood againſt the ſides of the veins being leſs than that againſt the ſides of the arteries. In the veins there is no pulſe, becauſe the blood is thrown into them with a continued ſtream, and becauſe it moves from a narrow channel to a wider. The capillary veins unite with one another, as the capillary arteries. In all the veins perpendicular to the horizon, excepting thoſe of the uterus and of the porta, are ſmall membranes or valves; like ſo many half thimbles ſtuck to the ſide of the veins, with their mouths towards the heart. In the motion of the blood towards the heart, they are preſſed cloſe to the ſide of the veins; but if blood ſhould fall back, it muſt fill the valves; and they being diſtended, ſtop up the channel, ſo that no blood can repaſs them. Quincy.

UN. A Saxon privative or negative particle anſwering to in of the Latins, and α of the Greeks, on, Dutch. It is placed almoſt at will, before adjectives and adverbs. All the inſtances of this kind of compoſition cannot therefore be inſerted but I have collected a number ſufficient, perhaps more than ſufficient, to explain it.

The examples however, though numerous, might have eaſily been made more; for almoſt every adjective has a ſubſtantive and an adverb adhering to it, as unfaithful, unfaithfulneſs, unfaithfully. Un is prefixed to adjectives with their derivatives, as unapt, unaptneſs, unaptly; and to paſſive participles as hurt, unhurt; favoured, unfavoured: it is prefixed likewiſe to participial adjectives, as pleaſing, unpleaſing, but rarely in the verbal ſenſe expreſſing action; we cannot ſay the dart flew unwounding, though we ſay the man eſcaped unwounded. In and un may be thus diſtinguiſhed. To words merely Engliſh we prefix un, as unfit; to words borrowed in the poſitive ſenſe, but made negative by ourſelves, we prefix un, as generous, ungenerous. When we borrow both words we retain the Latin or French in, as elegant, indulgent; politick, impolitick. Before ſubſtantives if they have the Engliſh termination neſs, as unfitneſs, ungraciouſneſs; it is proper to prefix un if they have the Latin or French terminations in tude, ice, or ence; and for the moſt part if they end in ty the negative in is put before them, as unapt, unaptneſs, inaptitude; unjuſt, injuſtice; imprudence; unfaithful, unfaithfulneſs, infidelity.

WA'TER. n. s. [water, Dutch; pæter, Saxon.]

1. Sir Isaac Newton defines water, when pure, to be a very fluid salt, volatile, and void of all savour or taste; and it seems to consist of small, smooth, hard, porous, spherical particles, of equal diameters, and of equal specifick gravities, as Dr. Cheyne observes; and also that there are between them spaces so large large, and ranged in such a manner, as to be pervious on all sides. Their smoothness accounts for their sliding easily over one another's surfaces: their sphericity keeps them also from touching one another in more points than one; and by both these their frictions in sliding over one another, is rendered the least possible. Their hardness accounts for the incompressibility of water, when it is free from the intermixture of air. The porosity of water is so very great, that there is at least forty times as much space as matter in it; for water is nineteen times specifically lighter than gold, and consequently rarer in the same proportion. Quincy.

Now in that year before the news came down of duke Hamilton's defeat, the ministers animated their people to rise and march to Edinburgh; and they came up marching on the head of their parishes with an unheard of fury, praying and preaching all the way as they came. The marquis of Argyle and his party came and headed them, they being about six thousand. They wander about in the air, not far from the ſurface of the earth; and are more frequent in places, that are unctuous, mouldy, marſhy, and abounding with reeds. They haunt burying-places, places of execution, dunghills. They commonly appear in ſummer, and at the beginning of autumn, and are generally at the height of about ſix feet from the ground. Now they dilate themſelves, and now contract. Now they go on like waves, and rain as it were ſparks of fire; but they burn nothing. They follow thoſe that run away, and fly from thoſe that follow them. Some that have been catched were obſerved to conſiſt of a ſhining, viſcous, and gelatinous matter, like the ſpawn of frogs, not hot or burning, but only ſhining; ſo that the matter ſeems to be phoſphorus, prepared and raiſed from putrified plants or carcaſſes by the heat of the ſun; which is condenſed by the cold of the evening, and then ſhines. Muſchenbroek.

1. The track of the ſun through the twelve ſigns; a great circle of the ſphere, containing the twelve ſigns.

The golden ſun ſalutes the morn,
And having gilt the ocean with his beams,
Gallops the zodiack in his gliſt'ring coach. Shak. ſp.

Years he number'd ſcarce thirteen,
When fates turn'd cruel;
Yet three fill'd zodiacks had he been
The ſtage's jewel. Ben Jonſon.

It exceeds even their abſurdity to ſuppoſe the zodiack and planets to be efficient of, and antecedent to themſelves, or to exert any influences before they were in being. Bentley.

Here in a ſhrine that caſt a dazzling light,
Sat fixt in thought the mighty Stagyrite;
His ſacred head a radiant zodiack crown'd,
And various animals his ſides ſurround. Pope.

2. It is uſed by Milton for a girdle.

By his ſide,

ZONE. n. ſ. [ζωνη; zona, Latin.]

1. A girdle.

The middle part
Girt like a ſtarry zone his waiſt, and round
Skirted his loins, and thighs, with downy gold
And colours dipp'd in heav'n. Milton's Par. Loſt.

An embroider'd zone ſurrounds her waiſt. Dryd.

Thy ſtatues, Venus, though by Phidias' hands
Deſign'd immortal, yet no longer ſtands;
The magick of thy ſhining zone is paſt,
But Saliſbury's garter ſhall for ever laſt. Granv.

Scarce could the goddeſs from her nymph be known,
But by the creſcent and the golden zone. Pope.

2. A diviſion of the earth.

The whole ſurface of the earth is divided into five zones: the firſt is contained between the two tropicks, and is called the torrid zone. There are two temperate zones, and two frigid zones. The northern temperate zone is terminated by the tropick of Cancer and the arctick polar circle: the ſouthern temperate zone is contained between the tropick of Capricorn and the polar circle: the frigid zones are circumſcribed by the polar circles, and the poles are in their centers.

True love is ſtill the ſame: the torrid zones,
And thoſe more frigid ones,
It muſt not know:
For love grown cold or hot,
Is luſt or friendſhip, not
The thing we ſhow:
For that's a flame would die,
Held down or up too high:
Then think I love more than I can expreſs,
And would love more, could I but love the leſs. Suckling.

And as five zones th' etherial regions bind,
Five correſpondent are to earth aſſign'd:
The ſun, with rays directly darting down,
Fires all beneath, and fries the middle zone. Dry.

3. Circuit; circumference.

Hath finiſh'd half his journey, and ſcarce begins
His other half in the great zone of heav'n. Milton.

AFTER-SWARMS. n. ſ. [after and ſwarms.] Secundary or poſterior ſwarms frequently found to quit the hives a fortnight after the firſt.

After-ſwarms differ from the prime, in that the latter are directed by the vulgar, or crowd of bees, whoſe only rule is the fulneſs of the hives; whereas the former are appointed by the ruling bees, and indicated by a noiſe or call, which theſe make for the ſpace of two or three days, as it were to give warning to the common herd to prepare for a march. Within eight or ten days after the prime-ſwarm is gone, if the princeſs next in order, find a competent number fledged and ready, ſhe begins to tune her treble voice, in a mournful and begging note, as if ſhe begged the queen-mother to let them go; to which voice, if ſhe vouchſafe a reply, by tuning her baſe to the other's treble, it marks her conſent: in conſequence of which, within a day or two after, if the weather allow, the new ſwarm appears. If the prime-ſwarm be broken, the after will both call and ſwarm the ſooner, perhaps the next day; in which caſe a third, ſometimes a fourth, ſucceeds in the ſame ſeaſon: but all uſually within a fortnight after the prime-ſwarm. Butler.

Its head and tail reſemble thoſe of a boar; and its legs and feet the goats. But beſides all theſe ſingularities, there is another thing in which it differs from all other known animals, which is, that it has four dentes exerti, or long and crooked tuſks, two of which ariſe from the lower jaw, and the other two from the other, making their way through the fleſh. Some have choſe to call them horns, but they are certainly more properly diſtinguiſhed by the name of teeth, as they have each their alveolus, from which they grow juſt in the manner of teeth, and are of the ſubſtance of ivory, not horn. He is found in the iſland of BORNEO. Dict.

BEGAVE'L. } Begheren, Teut. to beg; and gabel, Sax. gavelle, Fr. a tribute or toll.] A right granted to the citizens of Exeter by King Edward I. of collecting a certain tribute or toll upon all manner of wares brought to that city to be ſold, towards paving the ſtreets, repairing the walls, and the maintenance of the city, it was frequently called in old Engliſh, begavel, bethgavel, and chippinggavel. Antiq. of Exeter.

BA'RATRY. } n. ſ. In law ſignifies the moving
BA'RETRY. } and maintaining ſuits in diſturbance of the peace; and the taking and detaining houſes, lands, &c. by falſe inventions: the word barratterie in French ſignifies miſdemeanour, fraud, deceit; it is derived from the old word barat, which ſignifies any impoſition, whence alſo they ſay barratter, to impoſe on any one. 8 Rep. 31.

BARATRY, in a marine ſenſe: Signifies the maſter of a ſhip, or the mariners cheating the owners, or inſurers, whether it be done by running away with the ſhip, ſinking her, deſerting her, or embezzling the cargo.

BAR

BRI

Baratry of mariners is ſo epidemical on ſhip-board, that it is rare if the maſter, be his induſtry ever ſo great, can prevent it, by reaſon of the encouragement one knaviſh ſailor gives another; yet the law, in ſuch caſes, imputes the offences of the mariners to the negligence of the maſter, and from him the merchant is to ſeek for remedy for all goods, or merchandize loſt, embezzled, or otherwiſe damnified.

By the French ordonances, inſurers are not obliged to make good the loſs or damage accruing to a veſſel or its lading, by the fault of the maſter or crew, unleſs by the forms of the policy they be made accountable for the baratry of the patron. A maſter who without neceſſity, takes up money on the body, proviſion, or tackling of a ſhip, or ſells the effects on board, or, in his account of average, ſets down fictitious expences, ſhall pay the value, be declared unworthy being maſter, and baniſhed the port where he ordinarily reſided. In ſome caſes, he is alſo ſubject to corporal puniſhment, and even to death, where it appears he willingly threw away the ſhip.

BARATRY is alſo uſed for bribery or corruption in a judge, giving a falſe ſentence for money.

BARATRY is alſo uſed in middle age writers, for fraud or deceit in making of contracts, ſales, or the like. Dict.

BEAR. n. ſ. One who in Exchange Alley contracts for a certain quantity of ſtock in the public funds, on a future day, and at a ſtated price; or in other words ſells what he has not got. As the bear ſells the ſtock he is not poſſeſſed of, ſo the bull purchaſes what he has not money to pay for, but in caſe of any alteration in the price agreed on, either party pays or receives the difference.

BEAUTY-WAINING. adj. [beauty and wane.] Declining in beauty; having begun to ſuffer a diminution of beauty.

A beauty-waining, and diſtreſſed widow,
Ev'n in the afternoon of her beſt days,
Made prize, and purchaſe of his wanton eye.
Shakeſpeare's Rich. III.

BE'LLOW. } n. ſ. [Probably from the verb, bel-
BELLA'ND. } low, which is derived from bellan, Sax. to make a noiſe like an ox or cow, on account of the noiſe which the diſeaſed make.] A diſtemper very common in Derbyſhire and other countries where they ſmelt lead ore, to which beaſts and even poultry as well as men are ſubject: and for this reaſon, a certain ſpace round the ſmelting houſes, is called bellow-ground, where it is dangerous for any animal to feed. This diſorder is attended with languors, weakneſs, intolerable pains, ſenſation of griping in the belly, and generally coſtiveneſs. It frequently proves fatal.

The method of cure which has been found moſt ſucceſsful on this diſtemper, is to give cremor, or cryſtals of tartar in ſmall doſes, and to repeat them frequently; as two or three times a-day. Dict.

BEVILE'. n. ſ. In heraldry denotes a thing broken, or opening like a carpenter's rule: thus he beareth argent a chief bevile vert, by the name beverlis. Dictionary.

BLOODY-BONES. n. ſ. [bloody and bones.] An imaginary perſonage employed by nurſes to terrify children.

How ſilly were their ſages heretofore,
To fright their heroes with a ſiren whore!
Make them believe, a water witch with charms
Could ſink their men of war, as eaſy 's ſtorms,
And turn their mariners that heard them ſing,
Into land porpuſſes, or cod, or ling;
To terrify thoſe mighty champions,
As we do children now with bloody-bones. Butler.

BRIG. } n. ſ. [from brigantin, French.]
BRI'GANTINE. } Among Engliſh ſeamen, this veſſel

veſſel is diſtinguiſhed by having her main-ſail ſet nearly in the plane of her keel; whereas the main-ſails of larger ſhips are hung athwart, or at right angles with the ſhips length, and faſtened to a yard which hangs parallel to the deck: but in a brig, the foremoſt edge of the main-ſail is faſtened in different places to hoops which encircle the main-maſt, and ſlide up and down it as the ſail is hoiſted or lowered; it is extended by a gaff above, and by a boom below. Falconer.

BUFF. n. ſ. A colour nearly approaching to yellow.

BULL. n. ſ. An Exchange-alley term. Oppoſed to bear. See BEAR.

BY'SSUS. n. ſ. A word uſed in botany to expreſs a genus of moſſes, deſcribed by ſome of the ancients under the name of alcyonium, and belonging, in the Linnæan ſyſtem, to the claſs of cryptogamia algæ, the moſt imperfect of the whole claſs of vegetables. The characters of this genus are, that the moſſes of it are compoſed of ſimple and uniform parts, and always appear in form of excreſcences, either of a woolly, or of a duſty matter. It ſeems properly a genus of vegetables of a middle kind, between the muſhrooms and the moſſes, but not approaching to the latter, in that the ſeveral ſpecies of it are of a longer duration, and want that fleſhy texture which diſtinguiſhes the fungus claſs, and in that they never produce heads, nor have any thing of the figure or texture of fungi. The byſſi differ from the CONSERVÆ in that they do not grow in the water, and in their being compoſed of ſlenderer and ſhorter filaments. They have not yet been diſcovered to have either flower or ſeed, but appear always in form of threads, or of a light down, or fine powder, on the ſurfaces of many bodies, but principally on ſuch as are liable to putrefaction. Micheli, in his Nova Genera Plantarum, mentions the ſeeds of ſome of the byſſi, but later obſervers, and particularly the indefatigable Dillenius, were never able to obſerve them. This laſt author has deſcribed twenty ſpecies of theſe ſmall plants. This vegetable is formed in England, as well as in many parts of Europe, covering the ground like a carpet. Dict.

CINERES ETNÆ. n. ſ. [from cineres, Lat. cinders and etna.] A duſty and ſaline ſubſtance thrown out of Mount Ætna, in form of powder, and reſembling aſhes. After an eruption of this mountain, theſe ſaline aſhes are found ſcattered about the opening itſelf, down the ſides of the mountain, and over the country for ten miles and more round. Thoſe aſhes, which are found thrown to the diſtance of eight or ten miles, are generally taken up in form of a very dry duſt, almoſt inſipid to the taſte: but what lie upon, and round about the ſkirts of the mountain, are very different; they are never dry, though they lie many months expoſed to the ſun's heat, which is very great there, but always feel damp and wet, and are compoſed of larger or ſmaller lumps, and not of a fine powder. They are of a very ſtrong vitriolic taſte, reſembling that of our common green copperas. From this taſte, and from the great quantities of matter reſembling crocus martis, and with theſe a great abundance of ſulphur, which is burnt away, and the vaſt quantities alſo which are ſublimed about the mouths, and left unburnt, it appears, that the common pyrites is contained in vaſt abundance, in the bowels of the mountain, ſince green vitriol and ſulphur are its produce, and nothing is ſo eaſy as to calcine it with the purple powder reſembling crocus martis, which is the third ſubſtance ſo frequent there. This gives great weight to the opinion of thoſe who believe all the eruptions of the burning mountains in the ſeveral parts of the world to be owing to this mineral. Dictionary.

FRE'SCO. n. ſ. A kind of painting performed on freſh plaſter, or on a wall laid with mortar not yet dry; and with water colours.

This ſort of painting has a great advantage, by its incorporating with the mortar, and drying along with it, it is rendered extremely durable, and never fails or falls but along with it. The Italians, from whom we borrow the term, call it freſco, from its being frequently uſed for walls, alcoves, and other buildings in the open air.

Painting in freſco is very ancient, having been practiſed in the earlieſt ages of Greece and Rome. It is chiefly performed on walls, and vaults, newly plaſtered with lime and ſand; but the plaſter is only to be laid, in proportion, as the painting goes on; no more being to be done at once than the painter can diſpatch in a day, while it dries.

Before he begins to paint, a cartoon or deſign is uſually made on paper, to be calked, and tranſferred to the wall, about half an hour after the plaſter is applied. Dict.

G.

GA'LENIC, GALE'NICAL. adj. [from Galen.] Is that manner of conſidering and treating diſeaſes, founded on the principles of Galen, or introduced by Galen. Claud Galen was of Pergamus in Aſia, the ſon of Nicon, a famous geometrician and architect, and was a pupil of Satyron and Pelops, two able phyſicians. He was born under the emperor Adrian, in the year of Chriſt, 131, and firſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf at Athens, then at Alexandria, and laſtly at Rome; where he wrote a great deal, and where he alſo died.

He is ſaid to have compoſed two hundred treatiſes, whereof there are one hundred and ſeventy ſtill extant. There have been twenty-three ſeveral editions of this author. The firſt is that of Venice, in folio, in the year 1525, but the beſt is that of Paris, in thirteen volumes in folio, Greek and Latin, publiſhed in 1639. This author, collecting and digeſting what the phyſicians before him had done, and explaining every thing according to the ſtricteſt doctrine of the Peripatetics, ſet phyſic on a new footing; he introduced the doctrine of the four elements; the cardinal qualities, and their degrees; and the four humours or temperaments.

Galenic is more frequently used as contradistinguished from chemical. In this sense, Galenical medicine, and Galenical pharmacy, are those which proceed upon the easier preparations of herbs, &c. by infusion, decoction, &c. and attain their ends, and make their remedies effectual, by the combining and multiplying of ingredients: in opposition to the chemical medicines or pharmacy, which torture the materia medica by fire, and draw their more intimate and remote virtues by elaborate preparations; as calcination, digestion, fermentation, &c.

Medicine was wholly Galenical, till the time of Paracelsus. Geber indeed, and after him Raymund Lully, Arnoldus de Villa Nova, and Basil Valentine, made some attempts to apply chemistry to medicine; especially the last of them; but no great advance was made. Paracelsus, and after him Van Helmont, altered the whole body of medicine; exploded Galenism, and the peripatetic doctrine, and rendered medicine almost wholly chemical.

The late improvements in philosophy have reformed and retreived the Galenical medicine, which however has now little of Galen's in it. It is become all mechanical, and corpuscular; instead of qualities and degrees, every thing is now reduced to mechanical affections; to the figures, bulks, gravities, &c. of the component particles, and to the great principle of attraction. Dict.

Gordian-knot. n. s. Gordian-knot was a knot made in the leathers, or harness of Gordius, king of Phrygia, and father of Midas; so very intricate, that there was no finding where it began or ended.

The inhabitants had a tradition, that the oracle had declared, that he should be master of Asia, who could untie this knot. Alexander having undertaken it, and fearing that if he should not be able to effect it, it would be deemed an ill augury, and prove a check in the way of his conquests, cut it asunder with his sword; and then, says Quintus Curtius, either accomplished the oracle or eluded it. But Aristobulus gives a different account of this matter.

Some will have the phrase derived from Gordius, who tied the fatal knot; others from Gordium, a city in Phrygia, where the knot was made. Dict.

The harpoon, which is sometimes called the harpin-iron, is furnished with a long staff, having at one end a broad and flat triangular head sharpened at both edges, so as to penetrate the whale with facility: to the head of this weapon is fastened a long cord, called the whale line, which lies carefully coiled in the boat, in such a manner, as to run out without being interrupted or intangled. As soon as the boat has rowed within a competent distance of the whale, the harpooner, launches his instrument, and the fish, being wounded, immediately descends under the ice with amazing rapidity, carrying the harpoon along with him, and a considerable length of the line. Being soon exhausted with fatigue and loss of blood, he reascends, in order to breathe, where he presently expires, and floats upon the surface of the water. when they approach the carcase by drawing in the whale line. Falconer.

Hornpipe. n. s. A common instrument of music in Wales, consisting of a wooden pipe, with holes at stated distances, and a horn at each end; the one to collect the wind blown into it by the mouth, and the other to carry off the sounds, as modulated by the performer.

From this instrument, the English air so called, probably derived its name; the measure of this air is triple time, with six crotchets in a bar; four of which are to be beat with the hand down, and two up.

Hu'guenot. n. s. An appellation given by way of contempt to the reformed or Protestant Calvinists in France.

The name had its first rise in 1560: but authors are not agreed as to the origin and occasion thereof; one of the two following seems to be the least forced derivation.

One of the gates of the city of Tours, is called the gate Fourgon, by corruption from feu Hugon, the late Hugon. This Hugon was once Count of Tours, according to Eginhardus, in his life of Charles the Great, and to some other historians. He was, it seems, a very wicked man, who by his fierce and cruel temper made himself dreadful: so that after his death he was supposed to walk about in the night time, beating all those he met with: this tradition the judicious Thuanus has not scrupled to mention in his history. Davila, and other historians pretend, that the nickname of huguenots was first given to the French Protestants, because they used to meet in the night time in subterraneous vaults, near this gate of Hugon: and what seems to countenance this opinion is, that they were first called by the name of huguenots at this city of Tours.

Others assign a more illustrious origin to the name; and say, that the leaguers gave it the reformed, because they were for keeping the crown upon the head of the present line descended from Hugh Capet; whereas they were for giving it to the house of Guise, as descended from Charles the Great.

Others again derive it from a French and faulty pronunciation of the German word, eidgnossen, signifying confederates, and originally applied to that valiant part of the city of Geneva, which entered into an alliance with the Swiss Cantons, in order to maintain their liberties against the tyrannical attempts of Charles III. duke of Savoy. These confederates were called Eignots, whence Huguenots.

The persecution which they underwent has scarcely its parallel in the history of religion; though they obtained a peace from Henry III. in 1576, it was only of short continuance; and their sufferings mitigated by the famous edict of Nantes, granted to them in 1598 by Henry IV. were again renewed, after the revocation of the edict, by Lewis XIV. in 1685. Dict.
